NOT FOR EDUCATIONAL USE

Third Person Objective

- The narrator tells the story without revealing or describing any of the characters' thoughts or feelings
- The narrator gives an unbiased perspective
- Don't get confused with quotes! If you are quoting someone, and repeating their words, you can still be objective

Third Person Objective

Kelsey missed the bus today because she woke up at 7:45. Her cat was snuggling her, and so she stayed in bed to pet him for awhile. She said to her cat, "I am not a morning person."

*Even though there's an "I" in there, the narrator is not referring to himself or herself.

Third Person Omniscient

Kelsey woke up today with disbelief that she missed the bus again. She just couldn't get out of bed because she was feeling so exhausted. When Kelsey asked her mom for a ride to school, her mom was filled with disappointment. Her mom thought, how can one person have so much trouble getting out of bed? Kelsey arrived to school halfway through first period. Her fellow classmates judged her as she handed her late pass to the teacher for the third time that week.

Unreliable Narrator

- The readers can't trust the narrator for some reason
- Authors might do this intentionally to make a story more interesting
- Possible reasons the narrator's perspective is compromised:
 - They are a child
 - They are mentally unstable (example: schizophrenic)
 - They are extremely biased
 - They have an intellectual disability
 - They are a pathological liar
 - They have a skewed perception of reality
